I had heard some coyotes yapping up there and I went up to check it out. . . . I went alone, didn't find anything. The coyotes stayed out in the pasture. I figured there were two, maybe three of them. They yapped for a couple of hours, making fun of me, calling me ugly names, and daring me to come out and fight. Well, you know me. I'm no dummy. On January 25, 2002, another school shooting occurred. This time the shooting occurred at the Appalachian Law School. The violent attack was stopped by two men who had guns in their cars. The fast responses of two college students, Mikael Gross and Tracy Bridges, undoubtedly saved multiple lives.

Gross was outside the law school and just returning from lunch when Peter Odighizuwa started his attack. Bridges was in a classroom waiting for the lecture to start.

When the shots rang out, chaos erupted. Gross said, "People were running everywhere. They were jumping behind cars, running out in front of traffic, trying to get away."

Gross and Bridges did something quite different: both ran to their cars and got their guns. Along with Ted Besen who was unarmed, they approached Odighizuwa from different sides.

Bridges explained what happened: "I aimed my gun at Peter, and he tossed down his gun. Ted approached Peter who hit Ted in the jaw. Ted pushed Peter back, then we all jumped him.
